R. Andrew Bassford,, Assistant United States Attorney, Roanoke, Virginia, for United States; Marius D. Anderson, Pro Se Defendant.

The government has objected to any reduction in sentence for this defendant, who is eligible for such a reduction under 18 U.S.C. § 3582(c)(2) by virtue of the lowering of the crack cocaine guidelines.¹

I will overrule the government's objections.

The government's objections may be divided into three groups. First, the government emphasizes the conduct underlying the offense, including the amount of crack for which the defendant was responsible. Second, the government contends that the defendant's behavior while incarcerated militates against a reduction. Finally, the government points to the defendant's criminal history.

The guidelines provide a vehicle for consideration of conduct underlying an offense. The defendant's Total Offense Level takes into account the amount of crack cocaine for which the defendant was responsible and whether the defendant possessed a firearm during the offense. The government asserts that the defendant was held responsible for 340 grams of crack cocaine. The government is mistaken. The Presentence Investigation Report submitted to this court on April 24, 2002, calculated the defendant's offense level based on 149.99 grams of crack cocaine, in accord with the plea agreement.

The government's second argument is that the defendant has behaved in such a manner in prison as to indicate that it would be dangerous to release him into the community. In the six years that the defendant has been incarcerated, he has been sanctioned for two incidents of misconduct—refusing an order and being absent from his assignment. I do not find that the defendant's post-sentencing conduct has been "mediocre," and it is certainly not significant enough to bar the one-month reduction of his sentence that I have proposed.

Infractions in prison can be serious and may indicate that a defendant will disregard the rules and laws of the community. Accordingly, the Bureau of Prisons has the discretion to grant or withhold good time, giving some inmates the opportunity to eliminate fifteen percent of the total sentence imposed by the court. Nothing in my ruling today changes that. If the Bureau of Prisons has determined that the defendant's infractions warrant a reduction in his good time, then the defendant may be required to serve the entirety of his new sentence in prison. Furthermore, if the government decides that deprivation of good time is an insufficient penalty for an infraction, then it has the option of prosecuting an inmate for the crimes he committed in prison.

With regard to the defendant's criminal history, the guidelines also provide a mechanism for consideration of prior convictions through calculation of a criminal history score. In this case, the defendant's criminal history put him in Category IV and his guideline range was calculated accordingly. To do as the government suggests, would doubly penalize the defendant for his criminal history. Absent any evidence that the defendant's criminal history category uniquely fails to reflect his actual criminal history or danger to the public, I do not find his prior convictions to be a bar to reduction in sentence.

A separate judgement will be entered.
